

The Home Energy Scoring Tool defines each home's Score by comparing its estimated source energy use to a defined energy use range based on the Energy Information Administration (EIA)'s Residential Energy Consumption Survey (RECS) data adjusted for local weather data. This results in approximately 1,000 unique Home Energy Score scale ranges tied to each TMY3 weather station around the country. This system is what enables homes around the country to achieve Home Energy Scores from one to ten regardless of their region's specific climate conditions.

The table below provides the Score cut offs for each weather station. Using the first weather station (WS) as an example, a home will Score a 1 if the Home Energy Scoring Tool estimates it will use more than 218 mbtu (million British thermal units) in one year. In the same region, a home will Score a 2 if the Home Energy Scoring Tool estimates it will use between 218 and 196 mbtu per year. Finally, a home in the same region will Score a 10 if it estimated to use less than 75 mbtu per year.

The weather station for each Score is determined based on the home's entered address through a method that considers both linear distance from the weather station and elevation. The weather station selected for a particular home is included in the Home Energy Score Partner data extract for that home's Score.
