The often overlooked tax savings achieved via cost segregation, the recent 2012 Tangible Property Regulations, and EPAct 2005 179D will be explained by topic experts using numerous examples and offering practical strategies for implementation. .

The 2012 Tangible Property Regulations allow property owners to capture the depreciated value of certain building components removed during an energy retrofit or other real estate improvement project.

Further, EPAct 2005 179D (effective from 1.1.2006 through 12.31.2013) allows federal tax deductions for the installation of certain energy efficiency components in real property.

These tax strategies can add significant value during an energy upgrade project and also lower the true out of pocket costs of these projects. Don't overlook the money you are entitled to.
